

The Attorney General of the state of Indiana has informed me that the FCC is considering a proposal that will lessen the protection I now have accorded to me by Indiana's Telephone Privacy Law. Prior to Indiana enacting this law, I would receive, on the average, five unwanted phone calls from different telephone solicitors per week, not including at least three times that number of "hang-up" calls that I suspect were from telemarketers using auto-dial programs. Since I have joined Indiana's no-call list, unwanted calls to my residence have dropped to almost zero. Please do not lessen the protection from these unwanted calls that I now receive from our state's telephone privacy law.
